AIMS

SSTSA aims at providing a voice to translation scholars in Africa. Making this voice heard implies decolonising their own minds. SSTSA wants to be instrumental in this respect by exposing post-graduate students in translation studies to the most recent trends in translation theory and practice and by creating networks amongst scholars and future scholars for discussing uniquely African notions of and issues in translation.

These aims include:

- contributing to the development aims of NEPAD and the AU, amongst others, in facilitating effective communication and the effective dissemination of information in Africa
- engaging with African thought, African culture, and the interface between oral and literate communities as dialogue partners for translation studies
- playing a social-critical role in fostering the decolonisation of the African mind
- developing a uniquely African agenda for translation studies
- promoting research in translation studies in Africa, especially empirical research concerning the role of translation in the communication needs in Africa as well as in the development aid community in Africa
- enhancing research skills in translation studies in Africa
- offering academics and advanced students in translation studies in Africa the opportunity to meet, debate relevant issues, and network
- enhancing translator education at African universities
- enhancing translation practice in Africa
- providing the above in Africa in order to make it available to more students at affordable prices.

SSTSA aims at achieving this by way of the following:

- presenting the SSTSA biennially
- inviting scholars from Africa to present lectures and conduct workshops
- inviting one non-African speaker every year to foster dialogue with translation studies across the globe – at least every second year, this speaker should be from a Global South country
- interacting with scholars in related disciplines, e.g. African Studies, Communication Studies to exploit various approaches to Translation Studies as an interdisciplinary field
- presenting topics relevant to African interests in Translation Studies.
